Mangrove restoration has emerged as a low cost buffer that also supports fisheries and stores carbon. Insurance markets are already withdrawing from the most exposed districts, leaving households to carry the risk alone. Managed retreat remains politically difficult because it asks communities to abandon land their families have held for generations.